Unpublished poems are being used with permission of the poets. Poems that have been published are being used in accordance with the following guidelines:

The 2011 "Code of Best Practices in Fair Use for Poetry," a consensus document from a number of poetry-supporting organizations that include The Poetry Foundation and top-tier universities, supported by publishers and experts in copyright law and new media, indicates that poems not in the public domain (less than 70 years old) may be shared publicly in performance for instructive and inspirational purposes as long as the poet is given full credit and the work is not altered in any way. (Poems older than that are in the public domain and also require no special permission.)
